Writing for academic journals in English: metadiscursive features and epistemic moves

Dr. Rossella Latorraca
University of Salerno

The research article is the most valued genre for many academic disciplines, especially at an international level. Most leading international scientific journals publish exclusively in English and articles usually need to undergo a rigorous blind peer-review evaluation to be accepted for publication. As a result, authors of different disciplines and linguistic backgrounds need to become familiar with the metadiscursive and structural features of anglophone scientific publications. This seminar aims to outline the main structure of anglophone research articles and discuss metadiscursive linguistic devices used to signal the authors' stance to their claims and negotiate their acceptability.
